Following are extracts from the address of Governor Booth before the State Grange, at San Jose, on the 17th inst: CRNTALIZATION.

Whoever has studied the growth of our population must have observed an increasing tendency towards concentration in towns and cities, and that in the start of the productive induces and manufactures—the increase is in greater ratio than in the smaller, which depend upon local trade for support. It is noticeable, too, that cities where population and capital are concentrated have year by year a greater relative inducence in shaping the general policy of government. In them public opinion is massed, and can be thrown immediately upon any given point. They support the great newspapers, attract the leading men and surplus capital. The great moneyed interests, and schemes which have in cities their centers, are never without special and plausible advocates. They organize lobbies, and have agents and attorneys before every important legislative and congressional committee. Their influence is thus felt directly and specifically at the time and place where it is wanted. To illustrate: No capital of the same amount in this country, perhaps none in the world, has in the same time averaged as large profits upon the investment as that of the national banks. The security of their bills is Government bonds, on which tile banks receive interest. The medium by which they redeem is Government bonds, on which tile banks recei the world, has in the same time averaged as large profits upon the investment as that of the national banks. The security for their bills is Government bonds, on which tife banks receive interest. The medium by which they redeem is Government notes. The number of banks is limited, so they have a monopoly of the privileges they enjoy. Is it credible that but for the influence of the banks themselves and the public opinion they have been able to create, the Government, handling as it does, annually, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars in gold, and collectred million dollars in gold, and collect-ing and disbursing in gold and currency every year an amount equal to more than half the entire circulating medium required by the business of the country, with a credit based upon a comment, and supported by the patriotism and interest of the whole population, would not long since have furnished the currency direct making the profit on givent not long since have furnished the currency direct, making the profit on circulation a common benefit, and have made its exchangeable value equal to gold? The people themselves are entitled to whatever profit there is from the circulation of bills or money, which could have no value but for the credit given by them, and for whose redemption their own bonds are pledged. The problem is not a difficult one, but its practical solution has never been carnestly attempted. If any banking house enjoyed the credit commanded the resources and handled the money the Government does, it the money the Government does, it would find no difficulty in making its bills of par value with gold. Whenever any financial policy is proposed, it is "Wall street" that is heard. First, because Wall street, having a special interest, will speak; second, because we are spt to concede that Wall street, having made this subject a speciality, has a right to determine. In truth the Wall street apt to concede that Wall street, having made this subject a speciality, has a right to determine. In truth, the Wall street interests should bear about the same relation to the industrial pursuits of the country that the hands on the dial do to the machinery of a watch. If the main-spring and wheels are right, you can easily adjust the hands to register the movement. Our truff respective.

easily adjust the hands to register the movement. Our tariff represents no general principal or policy, either of "protection," "incidental protection," Nature and gets most of her assistance. Nature is his silent partner. But of what form of value does labor contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little, and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little and the invisible forces of Nature and sets of the contribute so little and th clearly disclosing just how far each spe-cial interest seeking protection was able to make itself heard. In some districts where irrigation is who togarded as the only assurance of a condition of the condition of tow regarded as the only assurance of a good crop of grain, deep plowing and Summer-fallowing might prove cheaper, more healthful, and about as successful. This can be determined by careful experiments and collection of facts. It will certainly be a public calamity if certainly be a public calamity if, under the operation of State laws, the sources of the supply of water necessary for irri-gation should pass into the possession of private parties. The mere statement of the possibility of a water monopoly is a stigma upon our law. Whoever has lived in the mines must have also also. n the mines must have observed that the ditch owners could own the mines if they desired to. The unrestricted control of the waters necessary for irrigation would confer the same power over lands. If a general system of irrigation should If a general system of irrigation should be projected, the work to be constructed and managed by the State, it is possible that a great deal of work would be done which would prove unnecessary and unprofitable; some portions of the State would be taxed for improvements in which they had no interest, and the min ing districts, to which water is as essential as to the farming, would have a right demand that the system should be extended to them.

Is it not possible to divide the State Is it not possible to divide the State into irrigation districts, allowing each to determine the question for itself, and giving to each acre a vested right to its pro rata of the water supply, and conferring upon each district the power to condemn the water rights which are necessary for its own irrigation?

Another question in connection with Another question in connection with this subject, will be the practicability of using the same canals for purposes of strigation and transportation.

MAIN STREET, PIOCHE, NEVADA. rrigation and transportation EIGHTEEN BILLIONS OF DEBT.

I have referred to the comparative overgrowth of cities. One of the objects, I observe, of the Granges is to simplify the machinery of exchange, to dispense with the middle-men as far as practicable, and bring producers and consumers more nearly together. In the degree in which they shall proceed in this, they will check one of the tendencies towards the concentration of capital and population. This increase of ital and population. This increase of city population and the aggregation of capital is not confined to the United capital is not confined to the United States, but is common to the civilized world. London is growing more rapidly than ever before, and the growth of Berlin in the past few years is as great a marvel as that of Chicago. The causes must be sought in principles of universal operation. At one period of the world's history, men gathered in cities, walled towns, for mutual protection. At another, cities were great political capitals. towns, for mutual protection. At another, cities were great political capitals, law-givers, in fact, making vast provinces and distant countries tributaries to their wealth and power by conquest. Now cities attain their importance as the centers and capitals of money, manufactures and commerce. Think for one moment how vastly their importance as mere money centers has been increased by the introduction of national funded debts. The funded debt of the United States is $1,738,245,500; that of the various States, $324,747,959; of counties and towns, $429,075,518; the last figures are from unofficial statistical tables, and are probably largely under. The floating debts of the General Government, and of the States, counties and cities,

It is important the friction in handling what he has to sell and what he must buy should be as light as possible, and that he should not be taxed in extra profits to pay losses by bad debts. Now he desires to know about where the money is to come from "to move the crops." He needs more capital at some times than at others; wants banking accomodations, and low interest. As moneyed interests, needs more capital at some times than at others; wants banking accomodations, and low interest. As moneyed interests, manufacturing interests and commercial interests, from the nature of their transactions, have their capital and pivoted centres, and as from the nature of their pursuits agricultural interests have not, but are as necessarily diffused as the others are concentrated, it is eminently proper they should organize for their own advancement and protection. Farmers living in comparative isolation ought to feel that there is a network of sympathy connecting each with all. This want the institution of the Patrons of Husbandry, through State and subordinate Granges, is intended to supply.

of my own recollection to which I have before referred, I recall with regret the destruction of trees. Now, it seems almost wanton and cruel. The spreading black wainut, the straight, lithe hickory, the tender ash and the hard oak, were girdled, felled, logged, rolled into heaps and burned to get them out of the way. One-quarter, perhaps a tenth, of these trees left standing, would be worth more now than the fields from which they were cleared.
